The Gender and Communication section would like to bring attention to its members to the series of events that the section will be hosting in the next months ahead of the IAMCR conference in Nairobi in July, 2021.
1) Digital ethnographies, intersectionality and interdisciplinarity: feminist methodologies from quantitative to participatory methods and queer research in the Covid-19 age

This webinar event, hosted by the Gender and Communications section of IAMCR, gathers together a diverse range of top female academics working across the Humanities and Social Sciences who are making use of feminist methodologies in an innovative and creative manner. In an age where teaching and research has had to adapt to the realities of remote working due to the Covid–19, we ask ourselves what does it mean to do “digital ethnography” research? How can quantitative methods be used by critical feminists to make better sense of the world? In what way can feminist methodologies be employed in the law profession, in a way so as to challenge the legal orthodoxies of the field?

At a time also when social injustices and equalities have again reached the foreground of many debates in the global public agenda, encouraged by movements such as the #BlackLivesMatter in 2020, how can we look at the narrative of equality within social science research and make sense of the plight of marginalised groups, such as LGBT lives? How might also feminist and community–based participatory research help us transform our research practice, and assist us in tackling some of these pressing current issues of social and gender inequalities?
These are just some of the questions and issues that the panellists will explore in their talk. The webinar will consist of presentations delivered by Professor Radhika Gajjala, professor of American Culture Studies and of Media and Communications, Bowling Green State University; Senior Lecturer Roisin Ryan–Flood, Director of the Centre for Intimate and Sexual Citizenship (CISC) at the University of Essex; Senior Lecturer Niamh Moore of the Department of Sociology, University of Edinburgh; Dr. Tanya Ni Mhuirthile, Assistant Professor in the School of Law and Government, Dublin City University; Rachel Cohen, Reader in Sociology, Department of Sociology, City, University of London, and Professor Helen Wood, Professor of Media and Cultural Studies, University of Lancaster, UK. It will be chaired by Dr. Carolina Matos, Senior Lecturer in Media and Sociology at the Department of Sociology, City, University of London.

For those who wish to sign up to the event, please send an e–mail to the chairs and co–chairs of the GEN IAMCR, Dr. Carolina Matos (Carolina.Matos.1@city.ac.uk ) and Patricia Núñez Gómez (pmunezgo@ccinf.ucm.es ).
The event will be on Friday the 15th of October, 2021, from 1 to 3pm (London UK time). Presenters will speak for around 10 mins, followed by a final 20 mins discussion session.

Chair: Dr. Carolina Matos, Senior Lecturer in Media and Sociology, Department of Sociology, City, University of London

Matos is a senior lecturer in Media and Sociology and PD of the MAs in Media and Communications and International Communications and Development in the Department of Sociology, City, University of London. Her research is in the field of media, gender and international development and she is the author of three books, various journal articles and book chapters.
1) Epistemologies of Doing: Doing (Internet/Digital) Media Ethnographies from 1993 to 2020

In a "Covid" world, more and more humanities researchers are reaching for remote research techniques. An alarming trend seems to be to name all these techniques in and of themselves as “digital ethnography.” This presentation will discuss the issues and problems associated with remote research, and what it means to do remote interviews vs actual ethnographic work of digital contexts. I will draw on my experience doing ethnography immersed online and offline since the 1990s to help us collectively think about the nuances, opportunities and limitations of adopting various remote research techniques. I will particularly focus on themes related to radically contextual intersectionality, and how this starts with a re-definition of the problem rather than just token inclusion or the stating of the layers of our identities and locations alone. I will also discuss my most recent (collaborative) work using data analytics tools as a critical feminist research of digital activist publics.

2) Feminist participatory research as playing "cat's cradle"

This presentation will draw on Haraway’s work on the string game of ‘cat’s cradle’ (1994) as a way into appreciating how feminist participatory research involves a reconfiguration of research relationships, and the research process. Drawing on examples of participatory research, we’ll explore why and how to do participatory research, how it can transform our research practice and how it might produce ‘worldly interference patterns’ (Haraway 1994).

Niamh Moore is an interdisciplinary feminist researcher, currently a senior lecturer in Sociology at the University of Edinburgh. She has published on ecofeminism, feminist theory and activism, community archiving, and many methodological issues, including ethics, community-based participatory research, and the archiving and reuse of academic research data. She is currently working on a book, DIY Academic Archiving: Creating open data and curating research materials (with Nikki Dunne, Martina Karels and Mary Hanlon) which draws on involvement in community archiving as a way of reimagining the project of ‘open data’ for qualitative researchers.
This paper will briefly discuss the manner in which feminist methodologies can be used to unpack law. Often analysing law using doctrinal legal methodologies results in findings which support the status quo. Employing feminist methodologies, enables us to dig below the surface and to expose the assumptions and presumptions inherent in law, to challenge legal orthodoxies and demonstrate how alternative, legally sound, outcomes can be arrived out when a different perspective is adopted.

Tanya Ní Mhuirthile is an Assistant Professor in the School of Law and Government in Dublin City University. She researches the impact of law on the human body. She advises Governments, civil servants and national and international NGOs on legislation and public policy in her areas of expertise. Tanya was appointed to the Gender Recognition Act Review Group in 2017. 3)Tanya was a member of the Northern/Ireland Feminist Judgments Project and is also a member of the Northern/Ireland Feminist Constitutions Project.
There is a long history of feminist antipathy to quantitative methods that has resulted in a notable absence of quantitative methods from feminist methods training and textbooks. Yet, feminist researchers have long employed quantitative analysis and today, as the data available multiplies, are doing so to ask, and answer, new questions. This paper reflects on this relationship, suggesting that while the diversity of feminist quantitative analysis is a good thing, there has been a failure to create a coherent feminist approach to quantitative analysis which has limited the impact of feminism on quantitative methodologies.

Dr Rachel Cohen is a Reader in Sociology. Her research focuses on work and employment, especially non-standard work. She is a former Editor of Radical Statistics and has an interested in feminists use (and non-use) of quantitative methods.
There have been astonishing advances in sexual citizenship in some parts of the globe in recent years. In the face of such changes, a new narrative of equality has emerged. According to this new narrative, LGBTQI people no longer experience oppression, or only at minimal levels. Yet this obscures the lived realities of many queer people who continue to experience hate crimes, bullying, harassment and material inequalities. This narrative of equality affects social sciences research. Previously, LGBT lives were seen as an ‘exotic other’, interesting by virtue of their Otherness. This was always problematic, because it rested on an assumption that studies of queer lives only produced insights relevant to them, rather than to wider social theory and societies.

I would like to propose two arguments. Firstly, I argue that the queerer lives gain increased equality in relation to sexual citizenship, the more marginalised they become in the social sciences. Secondly, that queer lives matter at an epistemological and ontological level. Drawing on Butler’s theory ‘Bodies that Matter’, in which she argued that queer bodies matter epistemologically, just not in a socio-political sense, I will make the case that this unfair marginalisation of queer histories, renders them of interest only to the extent that they experience oppression, thus ignoring how insights from their lives have wider relevance.
Róisín Ryan-Flood is a Senior Lecturer in Sociology and Director of the Centre for Intimate and Sexual Citizenship (CISC) at the University of Essex. Her research interests include gender, sexuality, citizenship, kinship and critical epistemologies. She is the author of Lesbian Motherhood: Gender, Families and Sexual Citizenship (Palgrave, 2009) and co-editor of Secrecy and Silence in the Research Process: Feminist Reflections (Routledge, 2010) and Transnationalising Reproduction: Third Party Conception in a Globalised World (Routledge, 2018). Since 2012, she has been co-editor of the journal Sexualities: Studies in Culture and Society (Sage). She is currently writing a book about gender and intimacy in the digital era, to be published by Palgrave.
This paper thinks about the challenges for feminist methodological practice in contemporary media and cultural studies, taking its charge from cultural studies which aims to be “radically contextual”. It considers the challenges of dealing with a hypermediated landscape which allows for the aggregation of human action as data and where textual responses to events can operate as barometers of feelings and modos. Drawing upon work which calls for a cultural studies approach to data as lived (Kennedy, 2018), this paper considers the ways in which the feminist researcher might encourage multiple and local forms of expression, that might be somatic, affective, embodied as well as textual, which both acknowledges and also resists assuming the affordances of technological capacities.

Professor Helen Wood is a researcher and teacher of media and cultural studies interrogating the relationship between gender, class and inequality. She is interested in media form, in particular television texts and their reception, as well as the broader institutional and commercial environments of production and their associated uneven participatory relations. She has experience in conducting audience research funded by the ESRC which can be read in the 2012 book Reacting to Reality Television: Audience, Performance, Value, Routledge and edited the collection Reality Television and Class 2011 BFI with Beverley Skeggs.
a) A Holistic Approach to Gender Equality in Media Development

Thursday, September 16, 2021
10:00–11:15am EDT / 16:00–17:15 CEST

The Center for International Media Assistance is pleased to invite you to a virtual workshop to discuss holistic approaches to gender equality in media development. The goal of this conversation is to address the root causes of the current lack of gender equality in the media by focusing squarely on how to develop gender inclusive institutions and foster the norms, values, and policies to challenge the existing power structures marginalizing women.

CIMA has commissioned three abstracts by experts in the field to enhance the discussion. These abstracts cover three key topics we would like to discuss during the workshop. These topics include: the policies, norms, values needed to foster and sustain gender equality in the media; the role of international donors and feminist foreign assistance policies in cultivating gender equality in media assistance efforts; and the role of the Global Media Monitoring Project as a catalyst for multi-sectoral collaboration for gendered media reform. Each of the abstracts are attached to this invitation and we ask that you please read them prior to the discussion.
The three authors, Claudia Padovani, Sheila Rao, and Sarah Macharia, will begin the workshop with brief presentations on their individual topic, followed by breakout groups to discuss each topic in more detail, and finally a return to the larger group to conclude. Claudia Padovani’s abstract for the workshop, Gender equality in media development: working towards an enabling environment, can be found here: Gender Inclusive Policies Norms Values_Padovani.pdf. For Sara Macharia’s abstract, The role of social movements in establishing gender equality in the news media and the potential for multisectoral collaboration and learning, can be found here: Multisectoral Collaboration_Macharia.pdf.

Please see also the short abstract for the Center for International Media Assistance (CIMA), The role of funders in facilitating a gender equal media: Feminist Foreign Assistance_Rao.pdf

This invitation-only workshop will include researchers, practitioners, donors, and implementers. The discussion will be hosted over Zoom and all participants must register in advance in order to attend. a) The Gender perspective in the coverage of violence against women and in feminicide violence

Violeta Radio, GAMAG, UNESCO, IPDC and the CEIICH of UNAM invite for the following course:
The Gender perspective in the coverage of violence against women and in feminicide violence

Dates: 11, 18 and 25 of September, 2021

The course is aims at journalists, editors, teachers and students. It is free and a certificate with curricular value will be delivered. Further information on content and methodology is available below

For further information, please see here: DD

b) GENDER EQUALITY PLANS IN PRACTICE: Towards sound and sustainable institutional change processes in research organizations

The Gender Equality Academy (H2020 project) has focus on training on gender equality in higher education. This is an online course: "GENDER EQUALITY PLANS IN PRACTICE: Towards sound and sustainable institutional change processes in research organizations" where all modules have been recorded and compiled from a set of courses that have been done during the last year. There are 7 modules and the course has a duration of 8 weeks.

1) Submission of articles to journals

Feminist Encounters: a journal of critical studies in culture and politics is an open access international peer reviewed academic journal, which has a global readership of 100,000 readers in 28 countries, it is free to publish with us and free to download articles. Guest Editors include: Gabriele Griffin, Uppsala University (SWEDEN), Yvonne Benschop, Radboud University (NETHERLANDS), Liisa Husu Örebro University (SWEDEN) and Hanken School of Economics (FINLAND)

2) Global media monitoring report on gender has been launched 14 July

Who makes the News (WMTN) is a knowledge, information and resource portal on media, gender and other axes of discrimination? It hosts the Global Media Monitoring Project (GMMP), The world's largest and longest running research and advocacy initiative that seeks to advance gender equality in and through the news media. Here we show the results of the sixth and largest study on the portrayal and representation of women in the world's news can be found in: https://whomakesthenews.org/gmmp–2020–final–reports/

3) GAMAG urges UN to help women journalists in Afghanistan

The Global Alliance on Media and Gender is deeply concerned about the situation of women, media professionals and women journalists in particular after the Taliban gained control of the Afghan capital Kabul, on August 15.

4) NEW Report in The Conversation on female scientists:

During the COVID-19 quarantines, scientists, like most professionals, took their work home. Women researchers, however, bore the disproportionate burden of caregiving responsibilities, forcing a drop in their productivity. Although this decrease may be temporary, my research suggests the hit to women’s reputations and their scientific impacts may compound over time, potentially setting female scientists back by years, if not decades, compared to their male colleagues.
